Small and Mid-Sized Businesses Can Leverage Document Collaboration Tools to Mitigate Project Risk During Periods of Shrinking IT Budgets, According to Special Report

Project failure rates are higher than ever during a period when businesses need to do more with less. Identifying the right document sharing and collaboration platform can go a long way towards mitigating project risk.

Framingham, MA – A new special report outlines how project risk can be offset through the use of the proper document sharing and collaboration system. This report openly discusses specific features and functionality that potential purchasers should be looking for and compares the basic features of eight of the more commonly used or best overall solutions.

The special report was prompted by a recent study by The Standish Group, a Boston-based IT project management research and consulting firm that surveyed 400 organizations and found a general decrease in IT project success rates during the past two years as IT budgets were squeezed. Given the availability of good collaborative tools in the marketplace and the nature of how projects fail, there are easy and inexpensive ways to mitigate risk. Improving a company's project failure rate can save an enormous amount of money and enable the firm to repurpose funds to help grow the business.
